

Religious Magazine Archive

Previously rare and inaccessible, high-demand primary source material

Religious magazines originally aimed at a popular readership are key primary sources through which to interpret myriad aspects of 20th-century religious history, relating to, for example, the evolution and development of religious movements, the changing relationship between religion and society/the state, and the influence of belief systems on public life.

By offering the full backfiles of major religious magazines spanning the 19th-21st centuries, Religious Magazine Archive makes newly accessible these key sources, for which archival issues have not widely been retained by libraries.

The availability of this material opens up countless new opportunities for research, across multiple disciplines. While this content is of particular value for studies in the history of religion, it will be of relevance also to areas such as social history, politics, theology, sociology, and international relations.

The magazines are all scanned from cover to cover in high-resolution color, ensuring that the original print artefacts are faithfully reproduced and that valuable non-article items, such as advertisements, are included. Detailed article-level indexing, with document feature flags, enables efficient searching and navigation of this content.

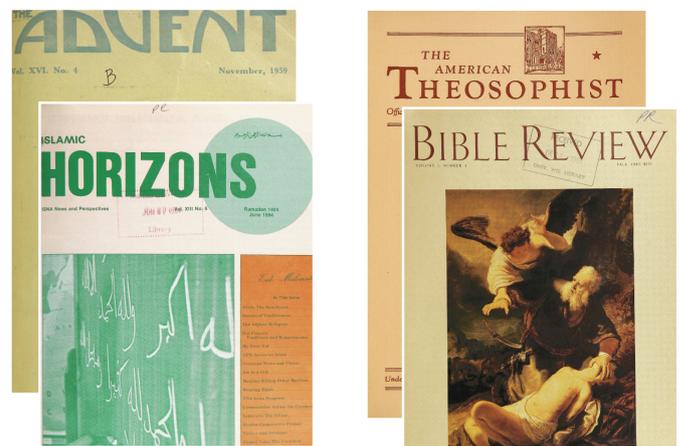

The publications in this collection span a wide range of religions and denominations, to maximize the opportunities for comparative study and research across multiple disciplines.
